Writing About Literature

What makes for a good literature paper?

An argument:

When you write an extended literary essay, often one requiring research, you are essentially making an argument. You are arguing that your perspective, interpretation, evaluative judgment, or critical evaluation is a valid one.

A debatable thesis statement:

Like any argument paper, your thesis must be specific, detailed, and reveal your perspective. Your perspective must also be debatable; there must be another side to the argument.

Examples:

You would not want to make an argument of this sort: Shakespeare’s Hamlet is a play about a young man who seeks revenge.

That doesn’t argue anything—it’s basically just a summary and isn’t debatable.

A better thesis would be: Hamlet experiences internal conflict because he is in love with his mother.

That is debatable, controversial even. The rest of a paper with this argument as its thesis will be an attempt to show, using specific examples from the text and evidence from scholars, (1) how Hamlet is in love with his mother, (2) why he’s in love with her, and (3) what implications there are for reading the play in this manner.

You also want to avoid a thesis statement like this: Spirituality means different things to different people. King Lear, The Book of Romans, and Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance each view the spirit differently.

Again, that says nothing that’s not already self-evident. Why bother writing a paper about that? You’re not writing an essay to list works that have nothing in common other than a general topic like "spirituality." You want to find certain works or authors that, while they may have several differences, do have some specific, unifying point. That point is your thesis.

A better thesis would be: Lear, Romans, and Zen each view the soul as the center of human personality. Then you prove it, using examples from the texts that show that the soul is the center of personality.
What kinds of topics are good ones?

The best topics are ones that originate out of your own reading of a work of literature, but here are some common approaches to consider:

- A discussion of a work’s characters: are they realistic, symbolic, or historical?
- A comparison/contrast of the choices different authors or characters make in a work
- A reading of a work based on an outside philosophical perspective (Ex. how would a Freudian read Hamlet?)
- A study of the sources or historical events that occasioned a particular work (Ex. comparing G.B. Shaw’s Pygmalion with the original Greek myth of Pygmalion)
- An analysis of a specific image occurring in several works
- A "deconstruction" of a particular work (Ex. unfolding an underlying racist worldview in Joseph Conrad’s Heart of Darkness)
- A reading from a political perspective (Ex. how would a Marxist read William Blake’s "London"?)
- A study of the social, political, or economic context in which a work was written—how does the context influence the work?

How do I use the information I find?

The secondary sources (research) you find are only to be used as an aid. Your thoughts, and the original text should make up most of the essay. As you develop your thesis, you will bring in the ideas of the scholars to back up what you have already said.

For example, say you are arguing that Huck Finn is a Christ figure; that’s your basic thesis. You give evidence from the novel that allows this reading, and then you might paraphrase a scholar. If the scholar states an important idea in a memorable way, use a direct quote. Either way, you will then link that idea to your thesis.

What about the MLA format?

- All research papers on literature use the MLA format, as it is the universal citation method for the field of literary studies. Whenever you use a primary or secondary source, whether you are quoting or paraphrasing, use parenthetical citations in the MLA format. Your Works Cited list will be the last page of your essay.

What else should I remember?

- Don’t leave a quote or paraphrase hanging – you must introduce it, explain it, and show how it relates to your thesis.
- Use block format on all quotations of four or more lines.
- When you quote brief passages of poetry, line and stanza divisions are shown as a slash (Ex. "Roses are red, / Violets are blue / You love me / And I like you").